With conference organisers looking for fresh ways of getting feedback and interaction with delegates, the voting system is a brilliant tool. Voting slides can be inserted into PowerPoint presentations offering a completely new dimension to any conference

Ask your audience a question with a choice of answers.

Similar to 'Who Wants to be a Millionaire', a question is posed, a selection of possible answers are revealed, the audience votes within a set time, the results are then calculated and are displayed on a slide as a bar or pie chart for all to see (the result can be hidden if required to be revealed at a later time).

Ask your audience their opinion based on “yes/no” “true/false” “agree/disagree” or a scale of agree/disagree

As above, a question is posed and the audience can vote within a set time. The result can be revealed or saved for a later time.

Each handset can be designated to a person allowing you to save data on such things as how quick they answered, what was their answer, were they right or wrong, did they change their opinion when asked the same question at a later time.

Each handset could also be designated to a person as a team member, data on both the person and the team can then be collected for analysis.

Prices are based on the number of delegates, the amount of work involved in producing the slides and collation of data required.

Great as an ice breaker, to lighten a conference atmosphere or to gain information for future analysis.
